Russia's restrictions on food imports

Abstract

Russia decided last week on an import ban on certain food products originating in countries that have imposed economic sanctions on Russia. All countries subject to the ban had at least some exports to Russia in these product categories last year.

Keywords: Russia, imports

Russia's restrictions on food imports

The Russian Government last week published its countermeasures directed towards those countries that have imposed economic sanctions on Russia. According to the document, approved by Prime Minister Medvedev, Russia will for one year ban imports of selected food products, including certain meat, fish and dairy products as well as fruits and vegetables originating in the following countries: United States, members of the European Union, Canada, Australia and Norway. These measures come into force on the day of their publication. Prime Minister Medvedev noted in the government meeting that children's food and imports by private persons are excluded from the import ban. He also said that the government may revise the length of the import ban at a later date. All countries that the Russian import ban concerns had at least some exports to Russia in these product categories last year, but for most countries the export volumes are limited.

N.B. The figures should not be regarded as perfectly accurate, due to limited availability of detailed trade data and some differences in the details of the customs nomenclatures used by different countries. The figures include only direct exports to Russia from a country; some exports could be transported through third countries but this cannot be distinguished from the data. Trade data in value-added terms is available only on a relatively aggregate level, e.g. for the sectors 'Agriculture, hunting, forestry and fishing' and 'Food products, beverages and tobacco'. For the above countries, the share of foreign value added originating in foreign agriculture and food, beverages and tobacco averaged 2% of the total exports of the agriculture sector and 5% of the total exports of the food, beverages and tobacco industry.
